The psychiatrist had misgivings about giving the drug to Huxley, and wrote, "I did not relish the possibility, however remote, of being the man who drove Aldous Huxley mad," but instead found him an ideal subject. For one of his friends, Huxley's poor eyesight manifested in both a The Door to Enlightenment desire to see and a strong interest in painting, which influenced the strong visual and artistic nature of his experience. Outside, the garden chairs take on such an immense intensity that he fears being overwhelmed; this gives him an insight into madness.
