There is a significant difference between a thermocline and a halocline -- find out what it is here!.

Halocline | oceanography | qezuhubixy.tk

Salinity spikes were seen from CTD profiles through sharp thermoclines/ haloclines in early studies. These salinity spikes were in error and cannot be eliminated.

a well-defined vertical salinity gradient in ocean or other saline water. A relatively sharp discontinuity in ocean salinity at a particular depth. In general, water with a higher concentration of salinity sinks below water that is less saline; therefore, saltier haloclines lie.

Halocline | Define Halocline at qezuhubixy.tk

Halocline, vertical zone in the oceanic water column in which salinity changes rapidly with depth, located below the well-mixed, uniformly saline surface water layer. In higher latitudinal areas of the North Pacific in which solar heating of the surface waters is low and rainfall.

The latter develop as a result of the specific seasonality of Halocline freshwater discharge in Halocline area. As Halocline result, the deep water is not exchanged regularly and tends to become stagnant. Salinity profiles are slightly corrected by replacing, for a centered window of N points, the value at the center point by the median value of this window:
