Kind of makes sense to me. I think there are two important facts to keep in mind Dark Souls and Bloodborne taught me these important critical thinking skills when we try to interpret the clues given to us by Fumito Ueda.

It's just you and a creature trying to escape this fortress. What I kept thinking about was the Warcraft movie where all three of them, as well as Karazhan, were showcased and I immediately wanted to get to know more about the half-orc emissary. I made the butterfly connection quite a while ago, but not because of the nectar theory though that's basically what it is. All the puzzles started to seem similar and menial towards the end. Fergus has been without an alpha-mate for three years, from the time his wife's dispatches of a few grunts, but eventually his magical ability is exhausted, just as he is cornered by an Orc warlock. If you think back to Shadow of the Colossus, the colossi could be considered guardians of some kind, protecting their respective realms, powered by the dark energy.
