Ode to Joy Program Notes - Western Piedmont Symphony

Schiller's popular "Ode to Joy" was published in 1795, and it is possible that Beethoven made his first of multiple attempts to set it to music in the early 1800s.

Just a giant orchestra of theremin players, performing the signature tune from Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 on what *seem* to be tiny Russian.

Some knowledgeable contemporaries declared that Beethoven had no understanding of how to write for voices; others wondered why there were voices in a symphony at all. Seek him in the heavens Above the stars must He dwell.

Any text you add should be original, not copied from other sources. For the full libretto, including all repetitions, see German Wikisource. The reason these arguments are interminable is that each interpretation contributes something to Ode to Joy understanding of the movement, but does not represent the whole story. Kees Immink Philips' chief engineer, who developed the CD, recalls that a commercial tug-of-war between the development partners, Sony and Philips, led to a settlement in a neutral cm diameter format.

After three instrumental variations on this theme, the human voice is presented in instrumentation:
