Life without art is unimaginable to me. When the girl asks Benny "what it was like with the pig, " a question that Haneke believes is central to the meaning of the film when applied to the death of the girl, Benny just shrugs and says, "It was only a pig. Artificially slowed down, the shot that kills the animal now sounds like an elongated clap of rolling thunder, while intermittent snowflakes add a bizarre touch. I think it's the exact opposite position. This could possibly be recuperated. That's what I wanted to show, and that worked very well" Toubiana interview. Later, Anna also breaks down in a moving, though quieter scene which ends part I once again in the car wash, but Haneke offers no apparent explanation for her sadness at this point. Because they had applauded a murder. Slowly Paul and Peter insinuate themselves into the house by relying on the fact that the video ever seem to lose its interest for Benny Arno Frisch the teenaged boy, presumably from Vienna, who seems to have shot the footage and around whose troubled life Haneke's film revolves. All the while, of course, we continue to hear the lacerating aural violence of the televised automobile race on the soundtrack, which meshes perfectly with the "real" violence we are also hearing.
